The two principal current intellectual challenges to conventional democratic theory, associative democracy and deliberative democracy, are seen, even by their advocates, as supplements to rather than complete replacements for representative democracy. In this connection, various theses of the shadow state or the state within the state have been advanced. In political science statism is the belief that the state should control either economic or social policy or both, to some degree.

Ezequiel Adamovsky. Volunteering should not be seen as something spontaneous. Georgetown University Law Center. Their campaigns were bolstered by the demographic shifts that had occurred in Africa in favour of the younger generation. The struggle also served as the context for critical stock-taking as manifested in the sovereign national conferences that were convened, the constitutional review exercises that took place and the truth and reconciliation exercises that were launched. Politics in the era of globalisation is much more complex than in previous eras. There are three main ones: in welfare, community self-governance, and corporate governance. Funding and standard setting are highly centralized.
